Making the IEP Process Work

Sally Fite Stanfield, Esq.
Callegary & Steedman

About the Program: Managing the stresses and challenges of your child's school experience can be a challenge when your child has a disability. When you and/or your child's teachers note difficulties or learning delays, many questions enter your mind.

- Does my child have a disability? What type of disability?
- What is the impact on my child's ability to learn?
- Does my child need special education services?
- How do I secure those services?
- What do I do if the school disagrees with me about what my child needs?

These questions and many more frame the discussion of how to navigate and use the IEP process to ensure that your child receives appropriate instruction, services, and supports.

About the Speaker: Sally Stanfield attended McDaniel College for her undergraduate degree, and earned her J.D. from Washington & Lee University School of Law. Prior to joining the law firm of Callegary & Steedman in March, 2004, Sally practiced as a Deputy Prosecuting Attorney in Washington state and then taught in a Title I physical education program for pre-kindergarten students in Baltimore County Public Schools, coached high school girls' lacrosse and officiated high school field hockey. Sally currently represents children with disabilities who need special education supports and services as well as students with IEPs who violate school discipline policies.
